Law enforcement officials say they're ready for "just about anything," even though U.S. intelligence agencies have not turned up any "hard evidence" indicating a terrorist attack is planned on the Olympic Games opening Saturday.

"We are unaware of any specific terrorist act that is directed against the Olympics," Richard T. Bretzing, the FBI's special agent in charge of the Los Angeles office, told a news conference Tuesday.

"We have no hard evidence to indicate that terrorist activities are being planned for these Games," he said.

For more than a year, intelligence agencies such as the CIA and National Security Agencies have put Olympic threats high on their list of priorities.
